MEMORANDUM FOR: Director of Central Intelligence

THROUGH:

Inspector General

Deputy Director (Support)

SUBJECT:

Joint Congressional Committee for Foreign

Intallignace

1. This memorandum contains a recommendation submitted for approval of the Director of Control Intelligence. Such recommendation to contained in paragraph 12.

- Intelligence is certain to arise in the 86th Congress. While it was defeated on the floor of the Senate in the 84th Congress, there were 42 separate measures for a Joint Committee in the 85th Congress. The Encentive Branch's position on a Joint Committee on Foreign Intelligence was established after Kational Security Council action on February 1, 1956, with the Precisiont approving the report of the Director of Control Intelligence dated 6 January 1956. In substance, the approved recommendations were that 4 Joint Committee would be an unaccessary supplement to emisting congressional review and that the present mechanisms are adequate. In addition, it was concluded that a Joint Committee would create jurisdictional problems due to the large against of Government agencies with responsibilities in the intelligence deficient such a Committee would raise substantial security problems and has out the conduct of foreign relations by the Executive Branch.
- 3. While the Agency has the problem common to all Executive agencies of establishing proper relations with the Congress in order to inform them and obtain necessary funds, there are four aspects of the problem which are popular to the Agency.

MORI/CDF Pages 1 thru 7

- a. Security. CIA is the only agency where security applied to such basic matters as personnel, budget, organization, and expenditures. This tends to breed suspicion and distruct on the part of Congressmen who are not informed. The security problem, therefore, is different in nature as well as degree from that of other Executive agencies.
- b. Finished intelligence for the policymakers in the Executive Erratin. Sound arguments can be made that such finished intelligence is the exclusive property of the President in view of his responsibility for the conduct of foreign affairs. A serious question is raised whether the Congress has a legitimate interest in finished intelligence except to determine whether a valuable return is received for the funds appropriated. Since intelligence is only one factor in policy decisions, providing Congress with finished intelligence alone sould well lead to serious political difficulties in which the Agency vitald be caught in the middle between the Executive and Legislative Branches.
- c. Jurisdiction. Most agencies can deal with the Congress representing their entire functional responsibilities whereas '1' is a focal point of the intelligence community comprised of components of other departments and agencies which have their own direct responsibility to the Congress. A formidable jurisdictional problem is thus presented and while it is one for the Congress to resolve, it is pertinent to our consideration a relations with the Congress.
- d. Covert Operations. In addition to the intelligence mission, the Agency is charged with the conduct of covert operations. Such operations are carried out in accordance with policy directive from appropriate Executive slements. In possible congressio and review of such activities there would be involved policy decisions for which CIA does not have responsibility.
- 4. We shall attempt to appraise the relative merits of handling CIA congressional relations under the existing system and under a Joint Committee system utilizing the above four factors.
 - a. Focusity. Under the existing system, security of the CLA subcommittees has been excellent, but it cannot be assumed that a Joint Committee would be less secure and under the Maudield type resolution the membership would be comprised solely of members of our subcommittees. (The staff problem will be discussed later.) The establishment of a Joint Committeesight have some adverse affect on relations with foreign intelligence services, out probably this would be of short duration as they could be brought to understand that fundame welly nothing had been changed.

- in Finished Intelligence on dersand from the Congress, there were seem to be little difference to the fundamental problem between our present subcommittee system and a Joint Committee. Cur present subcommittees have not raised this issue although they could at any time. There is somewhat more likelihood that the first foint Committee would immediately raise the issue but the first is the same under either system. In fact, a Joint Committee might tend to preclude other committees such as Foreign Relations from requesting the material which could happen under the present system.
- c. Justadiction. There are two sides to the question of jurisdiction. Ca the one hand is the question of extent of jurisdiction over intelligence matters which could be claime by the Joint Committee. The extent of asserted jurisdiction is a Joint Committee over the intelligence activities of other as theirs which have responsibilities to other committees is a matter of conjecture and concern. (in the other hand there is the question of how many committees properly can assert jurisdiction by the Agency at the present time. For example, a subcommittee # House Foreign Affairs on State Department Organization and Foreign Operations lists one of its responsibilities in the Legislative Calendar as ". . . liniuos with Central Intelligence Agency Also, legislation effecting (IA personnel might well be claim at by the Post Office and Civil Service Committees, whereas a Joint Committee could probably assert exclusive jurisdiction over the Agency in all matters except appropriations. Constally we have not been subject to any serious jurisdictional difficulties unser the present system, but it is likely that a Joint Committee would tend to cause jurisdictional questions to be raised.
- d. Covert Operations. On the question of covert operations, again there seems to be little basic difference in dealing with our subcommittees or with a Joint Committee. However, the existence of a Joint Committee would hard to bring the issue into focus So far the subcommittees have not certously considered policies under which CIA conducts its covers activities. A Joint Committee could almost certainly be expected to study such problems were carefully and might well be critical of policies, instructions, or particularly limitations put on by State or Defence. The pre dom of such policy guidance is delicate enough without having a third party, particularly a congressional group, enter the debate. It is, on balance, the subcommittees' system may be preferable from this point of view, although there is nothing to prevent the problems from arising with these also.

- but seems to be a growing distrust and suspicion of the Agency within the Congress. The Agency has not requested specific action by our subcommittees in this regard. The level of lack of knowledge of the Agency, its activities and its relations with Congress is illustrated by the fact that certain senior Congressmen on the Armed Services Committee were not aware that there was a CIA subcommittee. The publicity attendant a partite establishment of a Joint Committee would tend to lesses some of the suspicions as would the reports which presumably would be forthcoming. It is also likely that the Joint Committee would be of considerable as ristance in guiding through the congressional roll the relatively few items of an aded legislation.
- concerns the fundamental constitutional question of the relationship at tween the President and the Congress, particularly with regard to the President's function in the conduct of foreign affairs. This point is discussed in above detail in the OCI memorandum of 6 January 1956 to the National Vocatity Council. A Joint Committee is all likelihood would tend to bring the delination into charper focus although it is impossible to predict the approach which would be taken by a Joint Committee. However, it is true that the emisting subcommittees could raine the same issues. Since they have not, the constitutional question remains a distinct negative factor in asset is ing the desirability of a Joint Committee.
- 7. The membership on a joint Committee raises many draber. The various measures proposing a Joint Committee have specified describe nation of membership in different ways. In some cases it is left open except for the usual relationship between majority and minority parties, and in all likelihood seniority rules would apply. Under this arrangement the mould be increased dangers arising from the inflatible nature of selection. In the present system, the selection of membership on subcommittees is handled more informally and there have been no serious problems. Inder the Manefield type of resolution the membership includes only the numbers of the existing CIA subcommittees so no additional membership product is raised. However, it does raise the question of responsibility to additional committees. The Manefield type resolution does not climinal supervision of the Armed Services Committees but simply imposes the Joint Committee on top of the existing system, thus increasing our surden.

- 8. Some of the above problems are further emphasized by the fact that a Joint Committee would have its own staff. Presently the staffs working with the subcommittees have as much as they can handle in the way of work for other defense activities and tend to leave CIA alone. A stall for a Joint Committee, however, even if it were one man, would have but a small portion of its time taken up with the few legislativproblems this Agency has. There is little doubt that the staff's time! would, therefore, be sevoted to informing itself on intelligence activities and inquiring into substantive matters. The stail in turn would provote the internal of Committee members, and we could expect a far more active give and take than exists between the Agency and the subcom rittees. This would be time consuming and the probable detriments would probably tend to outwelch the benefits, as the increased accurity exposure and the tendency of the Joint Committee to interfere would probably have muse effect than any support we might wish the Committee to lead. However, the problem of the staff is not insoluble and the selection thereof cealed probably be worked out by mutual agreement between the Chairman and the Director. The staff problem is additionally unique in that to do their job properly they would gain access to the most sensitive of claude line activities on an across-the-board basis, whereas even within the Agency these activities are comparisonated and very few people in the Ages ty have full access. The normal turnover of staff people pessessing such i stad knowledge of Agency activities ac
- 9. Aside from the Agency's view on a Joint Committee, we could consider the position of the Executive Branch as a whole as expressed by the approved National Security Soundi action recommending against a Joint Committee. It is believed that certain people in the White House and the Bureau of the Sudget are strongly against the Joint Committee concept as inevitably leading to invasion of the preregatives of the Securive

Stanch by the Congress. There have been some indications that active efforts may have to be undertakes in this regard with respect to the Joint Committees on Atomic Energy and Internal Revenue Taxation. We have also heard strong expressions of opinion against the Joint Committees by various members of Congress. Certainly Senator Saltonstall, as an example, was strong in his belief when he was prompted to say "a Joint Committee would wreck CIA." Any consideration by the Agency of actions outside of the Agency on the question of a Joint Committee must consider these opinions.

- could be accomplished under our existing subcommittee system. A more careful review of Agency activities can be accomplished by our present subcommittees, whereas in the past there has not been a thorough review on an anotal basis. Some of the members of our setimony abriefles have concelled that powribly they have not lived up to the responsibilities in this respect. A review of Agency activities (not simply a briefleg on world affairs) accompanied by a statement or report issued to the membership of the Congress as a whole that a review has been conducted would to a long way to alleviate some of the pressures and meeting the stated objectives of a Joint Committee. Other possible action would be more frequent briefleg of the key stall members of the subcommittees. Such a procedure could, in part, answer Chairman Cannon's outstanding request on the Agency for sever method of briefleg the staff and, in turn, the subcommittee.
- 11. Meet of the problem areas which we have discussed raint the same fundamental issues whether there is a Joint Committee or whether the existing subcommittee system remain: -- the difference being that a Joint Committee system would be more likely to raise to issues thus giving the problem greater amphasis. Although some advantages no doubt would accrue from a Joint Committee system, it is concluded that on balance a Joint Committee would be undesirable. However, it is believed that the establishment of a Joint Committee could not be disastrous for the Agency. Certainly it would create some accommodates particularly as the result of the permanent staff but in all probability we could resulve most of the difficulties.
- 12. Therefore, the Agency should take affirmative action to alleviate the pressures for a Joint Committee by working more closely with the existing subcommittees and arging them to take positive actions on our behalf. In view of the established position of the Executive Evanch and the opinions of congressional leaders who also serve on our seacommittees, the Agency should not take direct action to legested! ; Joint Committee. As in the past, responses to queries as to the 🖽 🗄 position on a Joint Committee gasseally should be that the matter of one for the Congress to decide. In certain special situations that response could include a discussion of the factors listed bereis. addition, I would recommend that this study be placed before the President's Board of Consultants on Foreign Intelligence for their

MEMORANDUM FOR: THE DIRECTOR

The attached was written prior to the discussion at the White House with Harlow, Morgan and others on 10 November at which the Joint Committee problem was discussed. I think it desirable to attempt to look at both sides of the question and arrive at a net balance if only for our own thinking.
